THE MARSHALS SERVICE ADVANTAGE

Deputy Marshals without experience are hired at grade GS-5 while in training. After training, they advance to the grade GS-7 where the typical Deputy earns $22,000 per year including overtime. Experienced recruits start at GS-7. After a year of satisfactory service, Deputies typically earn $27,000 including overtime. While the actual earnings vary from office to office, their salaries reflect the average earnings for all Deputy Marshals.

The Marshals Service has one of the most comprehensive training programs available to professional law enforcement officers anywhere. After thirteen weeks of basic training, recruits undergo a structured 18 month on-the-job training program. After training tweny-four to thirty months on the job, Deputies are eligible to compete for specialized criminal investigator positions which provide additional training in personal security and fugitive investigations. Additional training is periodically provided to all law enforcement personnel to update their skills.

Normally, Deputies work Monday to Friday during daytime hours. While missions do require some occasional shift work, most Deputies have ample time with their friends and families on weekends and holidays.

Deputy U.S. Marshals travel frequently within the United States and to international locations. This travel involves many different types of assignments, from transporting/extraditing prisoners to investigations involving wanted fugitives.

The United States Marshals Service is a seasoned non-uniform Federal law enforcement agency, recognized internationally for achieving excellence and sophistication in the criminal justice system.
